• Start with a non-threatening, open-ended question to build rapport and get the respondent talking. Then place more difficult or sensitive questions at the end of the interview.

• Use probes to stimulate discussion and obtain more information. Common probes include:
  – “Please tell me more about that.”
  – “I’m not sure I understand. Could you explain that again [or in more detail]?”
  – “What would be an example of that?”
  – “If I were your client [boss, staff, the Governor, etc.], how would you describe that to me?”
  – “Is there anything else [on that topic] that you would like to add?”

• Stay silent to give the respondent time to think. When a respondent doesn’t start answering right away, don’t immediately start talking again. Silence (an expectant pause) can also be used as a sort of probe to indicate that more information is expected.

• Practice active listening. Active listening occurs when the listener provides feedback (verbal and/or nonverbal) to the respondent.

• Overcome barriers to active listening:
  – Suppress disruptive habits (finger drumming, change jingling).
  – Don’t begin reading documents provided by the interviewee.
  – Be aware of your biases and how they might be filtering the respondent’s message.
  – Don’t jump to conclusions; hear out the respondent.
  – Don’t interrupt or debate.
  – Don’t assume that you understand what the respondent meant; request clarification, especially of key words or ideas.
  – Don’t monopolize the conversation.
  – Turn off your cell phone.

• Use verbal active listening techniques:
  – Make reassuring sounds, such as “uh huh,” “I see,” “that’s interesting,” etc.
  – Probe the respondent’s initial responses in order to expand or clarify the information given.
  – On key points, restate in your own words what the respondent has just said.
  – Summarize the main points of the discussion.

• Use non-verbal active listening techniques:
  – Maintain eye contact and sit up straight.
  – Use occasional affirmative nods to show understanding and interest (but don’t let this become a habit lest it start to seem like you are approving, not just affirming the responses).
  – Take notes as appropriate to show that information is relevant and important.
